

Inside the Season of Protest, Pandemic, and Progress with the Brooklyn Nets

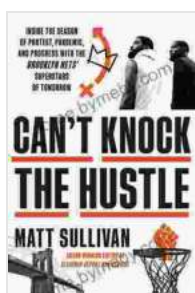

A Behind-the-Scenes Look at the Season That Changed Everything

The 2020-21 season was a whirlwind for the Brooklyn Nets. The team was coming off a disappointing playoff exit the previous year, and they had added a number of new players, including Kevin Durant and Kyrie Irving. Expectations were high, but the season got off to a rocky start.

The Nets struggled to find their footing early on, and they were plagued by injuries. Durant missed the entire season with an Achilles injury, and Irving only played in 54 games. Despite the adversity, the Nets managed to stay afloat. They finished the regular season with a 48-24 record, and they made it to the Eastern Conference semifinals.

The Nets' success was due in large part to the leadership of Caris LeVert and Spencer Dinwiddie. LeVert averaged 24.6 points per game, and Dinwiddie averaged 20.6 points per game. Both players stepped up in Durant and Irving's absence, and they helped the Nets win some big games.

The Nets' season was also marked by protests and the pandemic. The team played most of their home games in an empty arena, and they had to deal with the constant threat of COVID-19. Despite the challenges, the Nets managed to stay focused on basketball. They finished the season strong, and they made a run to the Eastern Conference semifinals.

The Nets' season was a roller coaster, but it was also a success. The team overcame adversity, and they came together as a group. They made a run to the Eastern Conference semifinals, and they gave their fans something to cheer for.
