Scent as a Language of Emotion: Unlocking the Power of Fragrance

THE POWERFUL LINK

Between Smell, Memory, and Emotion

Small has a stronger link to memory and emotion than any of the other senses.

We are 100 times more likely to remember something we smell versus something we see, and 75% of our everyday emotions are influenced by smell.

Thalamus = Sensory Checkpoint

When you hear, touch, or taste, the sensory information reaches the thalamus, which serves as your brain's relay station.

If they send the info to relevant brain areas such as the hippocampus, which is responsible for memory, and the amygdala, which processes emotion.

Smells bypass the thalamus.

Smells go straight to the olfactory bulb, on the brain's smell processing center. This bulb is directly linked to the amygdala (responsible for emotion) and hippocampus (responsible for memory).

Direct Link = Intense Association

The olfactory bulb's proximity to the brain's emotion and memory centers might explain why scent can immediately trigger a vivid memory or strong emotion.
