Early Life and Education

Theodore Roosevelt was born in New York City in 1858. He was a sickly child, but he developed a love of nature at an early age. He spent his summers exploring the countryside around his family's home on Long Island. Roosevelt attended Harvard College, where he studied natural history. After graduating from Harvard, Roosevelt worked as a cowboy in the Dakota Territory. He also served as a New York State Assemblyman and as a U.S. Civil Service Commissioner.

Conservationist and Naturalist

Roosevelt was a passionate advocate for the conservation of natural resources. He believed that it was important to protect the nation's forests, wildlife, and other natural resources for future generations. Roosevelt established the U.S. Forest Service and the National Park Service. He also signed into law the Antiquities Act, which allowed him to create national monuments.

Roosevelt was also a naturalist. He was an avid hunter and fisherman, and he wrote several books about his experiences in the outdoors. Roosevelt's writings helped to popularize the idea of conservation. He believed that people should enjoy the outdoors, but they should also protect it.

President of the United States

Roosevelt was elected President of the United States in 1901. He served two terms in office. During his presidency, Roosevelt continued to promote conservation and environmental protection. He also expanded the national park system and created the U.S. Bureau of Mines.

Legacy

Theodore Roosevelt's legacy as a naturalist and conservationist is immense. He helped to establish the national park system, and he inspired generations of Americans to appreciate and protect the natural world. Roosevelt's writings and speeches continue to be read and studied by people around the world. He is remembered as one of the most influential figures in the history of conservation.
